Africans in Australia: a Bibliography

General scholarship on demography, migration, multiculturalism

This is a small sample from an extensive range of material, in part relating to policy and funded by federal agencies such as the Department of Immigration, in part a critique of federal government policies evolving through the 1970s to the present day. Some items come from specific university programs such as the ANU's Australian Demographic and Social Research Institute. While early publications were often statistical and had only passing reference to Africans in Australia, there was increasing focus on African migration and settlement issues through the 1990s and into the current decade.

Critiques of national and international policies have increased, added to by a new range of anthropological and sociological scholarship on societal attitudes, race, racism and whiteness. The latter inevitably look inward at Australian society and cover a wider category of migrants than African Australians; this category is nevertheless important in signifying academic trends in the first decade of the twenty first century.

The section on general scholarship has considerable overlap with following sections and has not been divided on a chronological basis. Readers will note for themselves the evolving features of published material.
